

Missourians don't want right-to-work—so why does our Legislature?

By DAVID COOK
President

Senator Paul Wieland, a strong friend of labor said it best:

"The constituents that come up to talk to me say, 'You guys aren't going to pass right to work? You're not going to vote for it, are you?'...No constituent has ever come up to me and said, 'Paul, we really need you to go up there and vote for right to work.' It's just never happened."

Clearly, there is no public outcry calling for a right to work law in Missouri. On the contrary, Missourians who know what right to work laws are all about are adamantly and loudly opposed.

Why then, is the legislature so focused on passing this wage-killing, poverty-inducing law?

Perhaps they are listening to big out-of-state donors instead the citizens of Missouri. Last time I checked, our legislators are supposed to represent us, not out-of-state special interests.

Gov. Jay Nixon has taken a stand against the so-called "right to work" bill that caused much of the drama in the final week of the Missouri legislative session, and now Nixon confirms he won't hesitate to use his veto pen on it.

Republicans leadership forced a vote on the legislation and in response Democrats blocked debate the rest of the week. The bill would prevent workers from having to pay union dues as a requirement for employment. It also included a provision that would make any violation of it a misdemeanor, and make a violator subject to unlimited civil penalties.

"The bill to make Missouri a so-called 'Right-to-Work' state would stifle our economic growth, weaken the middle class – and even subject Missouri employers to criminal and unlimited civil liability," Nixon said. "It's clear that attacking workers and threatening businesses is the wrong economic development strategy for our state and it's not what Missourians sent us here to do."

The Governor says he'll expend energy drumming up opposition to a possible override. If backers of the bill don't find more "yay" votes than it got in passing out of the House and Senate, they won't have enough to overturn the Governor's veto.

It's about time we remind our legislators who they actually work for!
